

3. Incorrect. The answer is false not true. In a perfectly competitive market, there are enough producers and consumers so that neither producers nor consumers are able to influence the market-clearing price. The price is set in the market. Thus, producers face perfectly elastic demand curves at the market price. In addition a perfectly competitive market has a homogenous product, free entry and access with no collusion, and perfect information.