

4. Correct. The answer is false. Economists tend to favor the private market for such allocation when the market is perfectly competitive, property rights are well defined, there are no externalities, and the good, service or resource is not produced in a decreasing cost industry.