

31. Correct. The answer is true. Since changes in technology have made smaller plants more economical, generation is no longer considered a natural monopoly. This has led regulators and government electric utilities to restructure opening up generation, the wholesale market and in some cases the retail market to competition. However, transmission and distribution are still considered natural monopolies with government ownership or regulation.