

21. Correct. The answer is false. Pipeline companies were involved in very complex transactions: identifying and categorizing buyers and sellers; negotiating, monitoring and enforcing complex contracts, scheduling deliveries, managing flows of the commodity, and maintaining the physical delivery system. They provided a form of product-extension integration that involved economies of scope.