

8. Correct. The answer is true. Capital costs for large-scale energy projects are very high. Typically, the project must demonstrate that it has reserves large enough to produce for at least 20 years, long-term contracts to avoid possibilities of "hold-up" and be able to provide various types of stewardship, financial and management information to banks and other financiers to demonstrate the ability to meet financial obligations.