

9. Correct. The answer is true. Up front capital costs for LNG projects are quite high, typically in the billions of dollars. Liquefaction and regasification equipment along with special LNG ships have to be built. Reserves must be large enough to produce for at least 20 years to justify such high up front investment, and, generally, long term contracts must be in place to avoid a possibility of hold up.