

29. Correct. The answer is true. When Japan faces a supply curve rather than a given world price, it can minimize its costs of LNG by buying where marginal factor cost is equal to marginal revenue product but paying the average factor cost. Only if Japan can price discriminate and charge different suppliers different prices can it reduce its cost even more. The best case scenario is if Japan can perfectly price discriminate and pay each supplier their reservation price.