

3. In the second half of the 20th century, European natural gas markets became increasingly interconnected through continental pipelines, sub-ocean pipelines, and LNG transportation. Market structure was never competitive, on the contrary, government participation or supervision was always very strong, and firms tended to be very large.