

16. Correct. The answer is false. Although hydroelectricity can be considered 'clean' because of the absence of carbon emissions, it also has major regional and environmental impacts. Some impacts are positive such as providing flood control and water for recreation, fishing, and irrigation, others are negative such alteration in ecosystems that have adverse effects on human settlements, flora, and fauna.