

24. Correct. The answer is false. Photovoltaics are made from two layers of silicon material, or other semi-conductor that have added impurities. When sunshine hits the top material it knocks off electrons that go into the bottom material setting up a direct current.