

6. Correct. The answer is true. The slope of a consumer's indifference curve represents how much the consumer is willing to trade one good for another, or the negative marginal rate of substitution. Thus the consumer compensates for the loss of one good with more of another.