

7. Correct. The answer is false. Even if a group of consumers had the exact same income and all were charged identical prices, they could have different optimal bundles of goods due to differing preferences. Differing preferences will lead to distinct utility functions and indifference curves which will result in different optimal bundles.