

6. Correct. The answer is false. Energy intensity is measured as energy use per unit of output and is not directly a measure of how long fossil fuel reserves will last. However higher intensity indicates the economy is more dependent on energy for its output. Energy intensity tends to increase in emerging market countries as they are building up their infrastructure and capital stock and decrease with improved technology and the move towards a more service based economy.