

8. Correct. The answer is false. A secular scientist in many cultures would marshal facts and evidence to validate theories and seek the truth. The economic cultures and those that abstract are more likely to fall back on facts. Cultures that are associative are more likely to fall back on feelings to establish the truth. Educational systems play a significant role in determining whether a culture will behave more abstractly or more associatively.