

9. Correct. The answer is true. The three points of view that cultures take towards work are doing, being, or becoming. Doing cultures, such as the U.S., focus on outward accomplishments for tangible rewards. Being cultures, such as the Latin Americans, enjoy the here and now, and tend to be more spontaneous. They are more likely to accept circumstances and try to make the best of them, rather than changing circumstances. Becoming cultures focus more on the inner rewards of personal growth and self-actualization often associated with meditation and spiritual growth featured in Buddhism and Hinduism.