

10. Correct. The answer is true. Cultures that view people as basically good tend to trust people until they are proven untrustworthy. Cultures that view people as basically evil tend to use safeguards to protect themselves from people until they are proven trustworthy. If humans are changeable, as the Chinese believe, they will spend more time and effort on training and encouraging personal improvement. In the U.S., it is often believed that personalities and qualities are more immutable and more resources will be spent on selection and screening.